Robert W. Halli has returned to the Arnold collection for An Alabama Songbook. He has included over two hundred songs, divided into three roughly equal sections: ballads, (other) folksongs, and spirituals. Because he wished to represent the whole surviving collection with its much wider array of genres, he abandoned the organization by singers.

Delmore Brothers Ballads (narrative folksongs) and other types of folksong were also important traditional music forms and were associated primarily with domestic performance. According to musicologists Byron Arnold and Ray B. Browne, Alabama's traditional European American musicians favored a variety of folksong types, including traditional ballads, parlor songs, and lullabies.
